Vol. 3: Education and Schools
14	Aldridge, Deloris	CD/Tape	Emory	As the Grace Towns Hamilton Professor of Sociology and African American Studies at Emory University, one of the few chairs named after an African American women, Dr. Aldridge has served on and provided leadership on hundred of boards and consultancies. Born and reared in Tampa, Florida, Dr. Aldridge experienced a socially and culturally rich environment which was only segregated from whites. Such a childhood and adolescent environment motivated Dr. Aldridge to believe that success and achievement were normal and expected. Although top scholar at every level, Dr. Aldridge discusses challenges, obstacles, and accomplishment attained while studying and at schools in America and other countries. Dr. Aldridge demonstrated activism for social justice despite personal and professional risk. Dr. Aldridge established the Department of African American Studies at Emory University. Dr. Aldridge was one of the first professors hired at any of the elite private southern universities. Dr. Aldridge discusses the establishment a new department while building relationships and encouraging Black Students, negotiating university politics, and dealing with both supportive and indifferent colleagues at Emory. As promoter of humanity, Africa, and African-Americans, Dr. Aldridge provides a special view of how one can battle discrimination and opposition yet achieve at the highest levels.
